THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers,
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, MENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

CLUBS.. FOR TERMS TO CLUBS, SEE PROSPECTUS OR THIRD PAGE.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXX. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1851. WHOLE NO. 1545.

Choice Poetry.

THE TOWER OF THE BLACK DOUGLAS.

FROM FRASER'S MAGAZINE.

Not with a quiet mouralulness,
Not with a calm decay,
The strong house of the Bloody Heart
Passeth from earth away.
The ivy hath not clasped it round,
The lichen hath not fed,
Nor doth the wallflower and the cleft
Her dusky store unfold.

No herb is there; but like a sword
By long neglect were rusted,
The towns of grim Lord Archibald
With yellow moss incrusted.
And rain, a rain of wind and rain
Maris greave and jack and brand,
Like the dull dark spot on time may blot
Of the sunlit days of yore.

And down upon the winding stream
It bowereth, shrin as ever—
At the Ox-walk hill and stream, at time
Their pride and thou should sever
Like the old birds, as stern as they,
Who first their corners laid,
Who slept of good and evil chance
Both in one bosom shared.

About the fields are bright with corn,
And green the braland sweeping Along the lowly grave-mounds of Its tramped course is threading
And, mingling with the ever-song,
As sure the unchanging tide
Come sounds from the distant village, whose mirth
Hood oppresseth overhead.

Yet, over all the air is warm
From God the Father's gift
In house as dark, where Time by mark
Hath set, unless and cell—
The sunset glideth lower and low,
The fields are spreading dew
Of a Shadow, terror and mysterious Henceforth the fastest so.

The shadow of long protracted years—
Of the unwritten records of
Who Lived the castle in the rock,
The grim lord and his wife!
Enter they and beneath the sky
To the dark tower's keep
Time is stately hall to hide a timid,
Though of no hall beside.

Still are they souls of that old Lower—
And in the twilight gloom
You marked not the Dagger there, Lest the Black Douglas come—
Lest the Spanish Inquisitor
Against the gossamer stay.
The banner of the Bloody Heart
Be lifted, unfurled.

And, till the topmost stone be low,
Till ivy high wash moat they bite,
In the tenant-room of the Tower
The rats shall keep the e'state.
They hold its dark strength—ay,
They hold it still holiday—
Never so hallowed—it were sour
More merry and than they!

E. I. S.

Original Novelet.

VIRGINIA AND MAGDALENE: OR,
THE FOSTER SISTERS.
A WINTER EVENING'S STORY.

(CONTINUED.)

BY EMMA D. E. N. SOUTHWORTH,
AUTHOR OF "THE DESERTED WIFE," "SHANNONDALE," "RETRIBUTION," &c., &c.

Entered according to the Act of Congress, by Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

CHAPTER XIII.—CONTINUED.

No. Magdalene had no pride for him. The ungodliness of his heart, the ungodliness of his conduct, provoked her indignation, the haughtiness of his heart, the ungodliness of his conduct, provoked her contempt. But when you get the whole truth, you will scorn kind and pity us, will scorn blind and remember, brother, that there be here, and through the heaven, will scorn more ckeepers.

r. Rosse, physician of ot. Rosse was formerly guardian's gun-shop, and was ng his shop-window, ed to say, jo-cularly, e calling, and a ar the strongest hands upon the s sharp eye upon old be in silence, strument. "Josh! op! chop! chip- to response, as a ed much metal, to

In whatever you ations of proper ed to succeed. A ophisticated anything like a fixed, nature, and insures t most for man- e rarest honors! from poverty to ady to their pur- thing to-day, and ent idea just suit- the next—is al- nothing from one and admire the nuous nonchalance! be accomplishes! ted surely. The ll him, neither see few worthy of non contributes the new Annuals for very indignantly, are not consistent, difficulty in passing oung.

IGHT.

I known as a cruel ers, and birds, frogs y all been ill used by ll be found to be r Bretton's lares, he bered, busy with his ing the sheep, which the kitchen. E. R.

master's mark on the e, and which, from ed to be the most replied Wilkinson ; he put. His mark said Edmund, looking son, "that our Hen- turns He has made, ed. He could get on ly as children. ters to the bird, a with a bird's nest ir skin to the cat. ed their food and to Him; and was to said Edmund, as he spot.

that," replied the thought-lead us to ly to His creatures, ound, the tether following interesting the Pennsylvania the attention of the ing into the house. ary, I've such a great ll only be all cold- ching books red, too, ed your face, and ry, it is very beau- ful—and very use- ghty thing. You re- your thought every- ion said father, no- ing fishing with in this piece of glass, ed, because it is red. ll, and I can't help ly. But when you get ll, and I can't help

r happy in the purse.—T. S. Arthur

ers.

ngraving is very use- ed, to be placed in ed by means of a spirit ood has been used, ilted with boiling wa- ed Mr. Gray, and ion of tea, much superior ly way.

ngraving of corn flour, nsistance, a teaspoon- ful of water, and ed the dish to et it in the oven, and ed with butter or sauce, a quart of corn flour, ter, a small tea cup- ter moisty of milk. ed into them with the ually, the corn flour ; and when it has ed Thicker enough to be ll for this, add more e it with a little flour, and pour, and bake ORTER'S.—A correspondent writes that after the night of the Governor's reception, Virginia remained at home with Magdalene. The house was early, and they had not yet "dressed to receive calls," when a servant came to the door and placed two cards in the hands of Miss Washington. Virginia looked at them with surprise and displeasure.

They bore the names of Mr. Silas Snag, Mr. Moses Snag, Magdalene's new relations, and yet he could had been shut out from the company. Virginia impatiently cast the card into the grate, where they were soon shrivelled up in the flames, and burnt into tears of mingled grief and rage. To all Magdalene's inquiries, and efforts at soothing her, Virginia answered not a word, but—"I am sick and tired! yes! disgusted and worn out! with this city life. I wish to return to Prospect Place!" said She, with trifling exactitude, she repeated some twenty times, while sobbing passionately. And when her fit of crying was quite over, and she had wiped her eyes, she said,

"Yes, indeed, Meg, I am weary of English balconies, and Governor's nieces, and Senator's la-dies, and 'lighted halls,' and sounding music, and nodding plumes, and glistening jewels, and dressing, and visiting, and balls, and levees, and concerts, and plays, on and off the stage, and fervent high, and languid mornings!—oh! very, very weary indeed! If Satan does not aspire to my soul with some more attractive bait than 'sociality,' he will never get it, surely! I want to go back to the country, to old father Hawk, and Bride, and Gulliver, and the negroes, and the poultry. Oh! how I wish this winter was over, which seems as of long off and usual, which they call light and perfume, as if it were sunshine and violets! and scent so of sacred cream and cake eggs, dispelled with essences, which they call 'sets' and 'balls' to Miss Vanity Fair! and feel so like—nay, I have no simile for what I feel like!"

Virginia realized that she would not, at present, return, return the call of Mrs. Dean and her daughters.

The next week the fashionable world at Richmond were thrown into great excitement by the rumor of a ball to be given at the gubernatorial mansion, and to be given in a few days notice of invitation arrived for Judge Washington, Miss Washington, Sir Clinton, and Mr. Carey—none for Magdalene. It was always so. Magdalene never wished to send an apology for declining the invitation, but the Judge gave no excuse.

"We cannot, my love, do anything for Meg. dalene by treating him—a slight yet upon her—most likely it is purposed. Some evil genius of the family, who would at once lose their rank in the fashionable world, if they broke down too, sees the Governor to acknowledge and take home his only grandson daughter, Miss Mondego.

No, General Mountjoy received Magdalene with favor, I think—he has been immersed in business and politics, I never indulge fears of his neglect on the part of the ladies of his family. To-morrow the Governor leaves town, and will return on the first day of the ball,—which you must attend, Virginia; but after that I will myself call on him on Magdalene's behalf."

Very reluctantly Virginia consented to attend this ball. Indeed, it was the only theme of conversation—now so grave and stern—at home. Before setting out, she came to say her farewell in fine and brilliant in her light blue satin dress, with a wreath of white rose-buds in pearl and emeralds, encircling her raven hair, and a cloak of white fur around Magdalene, and pressing her to her bosom, said—

"If I go, Magdalene, it is for your sake, indeed it is. I am sick and tired of those proud ladies. General Mountjoy has just got home, and father intends to wait upon him to-morrow, for the purpose of having an interview with him. Oh! you know, Magdalene, that no one can withstand Judge Washington, he is so good. You know that it was mainly attributable to my father—to your guardian's great exertions, that General Mountjoy was not executed. So, you see, a word from him must—" Oh! Magdalene, I shall rot me! Mr. Carey placed about me all those people who have dared to slight her! Good-night, dear Magdalene!" and kissing her, Miss Virginia vanished from the room.

Magdalene's hopes were raised again. Could her grandfather's heart be so softened by the reception of so esteemed a man, and the relative of so valuable a gentleman as Judge Washington? Oh, yes! Yet he might! What would "to-morrow" or "the second" to-morrow" of her great anxiety produce? It was a long and wakeful night, which was all her aunt's descent hours that were allowed to her. Anxiety, fear, hope, and disappointment had been her food and her bed excited, by turns, almost to fever.

Judge Washington kept his promise in going to see General Mountjoy, and the long hours of the morning were spent by Magdalene in watching for Magdalene and Virginia. It was near noon when he returned, and the anxiety and disappointment of expression of countenance. Virginia sprang to meet him, opened her mouth to speak to him, but the Judge, placing his hand upon her lips, stopped her, and passing up to Magdalene, took her hand, and led her to a chair, and sat down.

"I have indisposed possession of you now, Magdalene. You are henceforth my daughter."

Endorsed according to the Act of Congress, by Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

CHAPTER XIV.

PARTING.

And must this block become we two!
We must not part, we cannot part!
That element at our change a heart
Is rent, and cannot be made whole!

The end of the scenes approached. Joseph had passed a triumphant examination, and had been admitted to practice at the bar. Judge Washington had presented him to many of his friends, men of great influence; he had also given him a letter to the governor of Pennsylvania, in which he had most handsomely introduced him—all that it was only her position he despised, and in her perfect position she excused him of this, only this, fault. But the end of all these proceedings, which were had in connection with the marriage of her aunt, was indivisible. that she could not have love with all her heart, for one who did not meet her aspirations after social excellence.

Magdalene arose late in the morning. She found the house deserted, for all had left Richmond, and only waiting for her appearance before sitting down to breakfast. She dressed herself, and descended. She ate, from utter loneliness, a hasty breakfast, and then left the room, and went out to fresh air. Soon after breakfast, Virginia, attended by Sir Clinton Carey, went out to visit the engagement; she had previously invited Magdalene to go with her, but Magdalene, ruled by a mild, tenacious, persistent will, refused to remain at home. Judge Washington and Joseph, or Mr. Carey, as we should call him, were engaged in the study of the former. Magdalene was the only occupant of the drawing-room, and through the long hours of the day she had leaden hours with a sickening heart. Every carriage that approached the house, every step that came near, aroused her expectation, and then disappointed her. It was, now, cards left for Miss Washington and Miss Carey, and now and then, a message from Judge Washington coming on business to Judge Washington.

Virginia returned from the visit, and was Selected Poetry.

MARTHA HOPKINS.

A BALLAD OF INDIANA.

From the kitchen, Martha Hopkins, as she stood there making pies, Scrubbed with a broom the pathway to the hard stone her eyes,
Where along the distant hillside, her yearling heifer bell
And a little grass is growing on a maple sight or well.

All the air is full of science, for there isn't any school,
And boys, with tanned-up pantaloons, are wading in the pool;
Bitchey Bill, unmolested chickens, cackling, for they cannot laugh;
Where the sly summer leghorn, sneaky leaps the little calf.

Gentle eyes of Martha Hopkins' tell me, wherefore do ye pine,
On the ground that's being furnished for the planting of the mine?
Tell me wherefore, down the valley, ye have turned the turnpike way,
Far beyond the cattle pasture, and the lonely yard,
with its clay?

Ah! the dog-wood tree may blossom, and the door
yard grass may grow,
With the tears of amber dropping from the washing on the line
And the morning's breath of holiness, lightly brush her freckled cheek
Little recketh Martha Hopkins of the tides of flowing they speak.

When the Summer's burning solstice on the crusty
pie shall fall,
She has watched a man on horseback riding down
the turnpike road,
Many times she saw him turning, looking backward
quite before,
Till amid the trees she lost him in the shadow of the hour.

Ere the suppositions was over, he had passed the hills of brush,
Crossed the rocky rolling pillow river, and had forded
quite a creek,
And his furious flight was taken, at the time, for pork and beans,
With the tradewind the Wabash to the wheat at New Orleans.

Therefore watches Martha Hopkins—holding in her hand the pans,
When the sound of distant footsteps seems exactly like a man's,
Not a word the stove-pipe rattles, not a door behind her stirs,
For she seems to hear the rattle of her letting down the bars.

Often sees she men on horseback, coming down the turnpike road,
But they turned as John Jackson, she can see it well enough;
And he thinks he'll get a carriage, and they'll spend a day in town,
That their love will surely kindle, and what comfort it will give,
To sit down to the first breakfast, in the cabin where they'll live.

Tender eyes of Martha Hopkins' what has got you in a mist,
To a way that fain to glitter, on the rustic of the spar,
All the eye of love may brighten, to be certain who it sees,
Our men rode down each corduroy, when hallelujahs
by the trees.

But her eager eyes remain'de, she forgets the pan and
As she sees a man on horseback, round the corner of the shed,
Now he on another agent, got the rants and mounts
his horse,
To the corner home that gallops, 'tis John Jackson self that's there!

Pictures of Life.

CURIOSITIES OF ADVERTISING LITERATURE.

FROM CHAMBER'S EDINBURGH JOURNAL.

The "constant reader" of the newspaper always reads, or at least glances at the advertisements. Those who merely take up the broad sheet to glance the passing news of the day, ought those time so employed wasted or ill-bestowed: but the experienced and newspaper-accustomed reader knows better. He has discovered that the department mentioned contains bits of news, not unfrequently, and sometimes, very valuable, very curious and useful, and such as are to be obtained through almost no other channel. He has learned gradually to find in it sometimes more—sometimes less than he originally looked for imagination, to entice his heart. In the case of a metropolitan print, it appears to him to be an epitome of London, just as London is an epitome of the world, and his soul expands as he sees within its grasp, in the essay, as it were, of his mental vision, the joys, the sorrows, the necessities, the cravings, the longings, and the strivings of society—in short, the whole social microcosm. And from long practice, his experienced eye, ranging from column to column, can pick out at that is peculiar and interesting in those pages, grasps as readily as a first-edition can detect a royal hart upon a distant hill-side, or an alderman the tail-line of turtle in the wide waters. In accordance with the order in which advertisements are usually arranged, according to their classes, accounts for his facility, which to the casual-eyed would look like an instinct. On the peculiar class of advertisements, however, with which we have thought some specimens might prove amusing to our readers, the connoisseur can profess no skill. They are to be found almost exclusively in one paper; but in that one paper relatively and absolutely in a large number to its columns.

Most newspaper readers have observed themselves, or have heard allusions to, "the second column of the Times." At the top, generally of the second, though sometimes of the third, or even the fourth column of the first page of that wonderful journal, appear day by day announcements so miscellaneous, and at the same time so peculiar, that they